dreamed of muddy water. I kept dreaming of it all night long. It came on and on, rolling up to my very feet. The waves were big, turbulent, threatening. I was afraid." A sign of trouble." murmured Florence; "that is, unless it cleared. Did it clear." Mabel frowned. She closed her fan and tapped it impatiently against the palm of her other hand.

her other hand.

"No, it didn't," she answered; "but what difference did that make? Do you believe in dreams and signs and wonders and all the rest of that tomfoolery?"

Florence pressed the tips of her gloved fingers against her mouth to conceal a Nawn. "Not necessarily, said she.

The fact of the matter was that dreams and signs and wonders were a part of her

The fact of the matter was that dreams and signs and wonders were a part of her eligion, but the matines was not exactly he place for a heated discussion. Beddes, she was Mabel's guest.

"When did you hear from Arthur?" she sked, with a quick change of subject, orthur was Mebel's soldier sweetheart.

"That is the trouble," sighed Mabel. "I aven't heard from him for ages, but I am appecting him home daily. His regiment ame last week, but he was not with it. apecting him home daily. His regiment ame last week, but he was not with it. Perhaps he stopped somewhere to rest. t is a wonder they didn't all die down here in that oven of a place." Then under here breath she added, "I hate that dream of media works." of muddy water."
"I thought you didn't believe in dreams," exclaimed Florence.

"I don't, but—"
She was interrupted by the appearance of "Me and Jack" upon the canvas. There was a ripple of subdued laughter as the little girl fell from the ropes into the water; dog swimming coolly off and leaving Picture after picture was then presented. Picture was the naval parade, the warships passing up the Hudson, the yachts skimming swiftly in front of them, partially obstructing the view of the sullors who stood like white statues along their decks; next Hobson walked leisurely down the deck of a little cruiser; then a review of the troops at Tampa was announced.

"Perhaps it is Arthur's regiment that is to be reviewed?" whispered Mabel, clasping ther hands cestatically together. "Oh, I the status of the troops at Tampa was announced."

"and they walk as if they were tired to death."

A white dog, the mascot of the regiment, occupied the center of the canvas for a second, a soldier following.

A piece of paper floated along behind. Then came a row of six stalwart men. The man in front suddenly turned his face toward the audience. He looked straight at Mabel. His eyes were hollow and sad intense wearlness was stamped upon every line of his gaunt features.

Mabel leaned eagerly forward. She laid hold of Florence's arm.

"Look, Florence's arm.

"Look, Florence!" she gasped. "Look, it is Arthur!"

In a moment the face was gone from the canvas, others had taken its place, the drum ceased to beat, the review was over, and the canvas was dark again.

Mabel was white to the lips. She hurriedly gathered up her belongings, her fan, her handkerchief, her opera glasses.

"What are you about?" asked Florence; "the thing is not half over."

"I can't help it," said Mabel. "I must go now. The heat in here is stifling. I can't stand it. I must have the fresh air."

Outside she trembled so that Florence took her arm.

"If I were you," she said, "I should be Outside she trembled so that riotate took her arm.
"If I were you," she said, "I should be glad that I saw him. Why do you worry

"His eyes were hollow and sad," stammered Mabel, "and his cheeks were thin. He looked so tired, so dead tired! Oh, Florence, suppose he is very ill, suppose—Oh, remember my dream!"

Florence affected an overwhelming surprise "I thought you didn't believe in dreams," on't, I don't. Why but an idlot would believe in such rank foolishness— but you can't help thinking—"Oh, yes you can. Come, we will take this car, and I will see you home myself. Don't be silly." By the time they reached the house Florence had coaxed the girl into something right foldin like her old gayety. She laughed at a bit of her nonsense as they ran up the steps room sets, of her nonsense as they ran up the steps together.

They passed into the hall. On a little table reserved for cards lay a letter.

Mabel took it up and held it between her forefinger and thumb. It was old and yellow. A dozen postmarks disfigured the face of it, upon which there was no stamp. Florence took it from her.

"I will open it for you," she said.

Mabel sunk upon her knees on the carpet. She remained there trembling, her white face clasped between her slender, bloodless fingers.

THE FACE ON THE CANVAS.

From the Criterien.

It was at the matinee. The curtain had fallen upon a one act farce and the house was darkened for the blograph.

Two girls sat in the left-hand box, chatting together. Their faces shone whitely in the half-light. The fines of their profiles were so delicately fine that many turned to look at them.

"Lust night," Mabel was saying, "I dreamed of muddy water. I kept dreaming of it all right long. It came on and on, of it all right long. It came on and on, of it all right long. The ways were set.
